Donna Eder is professor of sociology at Indiana University. She earned her Ph.D. in 1979 from the University of Wisconsin. She has written numerous journal articles and book chapters in the areas of gender, schooling, and women's culture. Her current research involves in-depth interviews with storytellers from different cultures to better understand the role of storytelling in teaching about social differences and social dynamics. Eder has a deep interest in the sociology of education and in community. Her first major research study of adolescent peer culture, School Talk: Gender and Adolescent Culture, led to her creating a service project in the Bloomington schools, Kids Against Cruel Treatment in Schools. This became an essential part of her first service learning course, Social Context of Schooling. This revealed many social and ethical issues, launching Eder into more research. This time learning from Navajo and Kenyan storytellers how children can understand ethics and diversity through practices used in oral cultures. She borrowed non-western concepts of learning as she crafted a service learning project, Storytelling as Reflecting Time, which became the basis of a service learning course, Knowledge and Community Taught to Sociology Majors and Honor Students. The approach is so effective that Eder cannot accommodate all of the requests she receives for Start, which is conducted both in the classroom and through extracurricular activities throughout Bloomington. She works with the Hutton Philanthropic Initiative where students use storytelling to interact with community children in a meaningful way. Students in her Community Building Across Generations course take their storytelling to a nursing home and a program for children whose families are escaping domestic violence. Eder also mentors other instructors on campus who are interested in service learning self esteem is individual s positive or negative attitude toward the self based on selfevaluations lifespan research reveals that female s self esteem is lowest during adolescence one explanation for this can be derived from the gender intensification hypothesis which proposes that during adolescence there is an increase in gender congruent socialization this may lead adolescent females to place greater importance on their feminine identity on the other hand among adult females self esteem has been shown to increase some have suggested that this may be due to females deviation from traditional gender roles perhaps as a result of a decrease in the importance placed on feminine identity to date no research has examined the importance of feminine identity as a predictor of the drop in self esteem in adolescence and subsequent increase during adulthood thus the purpose of this study was to explore the importance of feminine identity as a moderator of the relationship between gender identity and self esteem in adolescent and adult females it was hypothesized that 1 adolescent females would place greater importance on feminine identity than adult females 2 feminine and androgynous adolescents would have higher self esteem than masculine adolescents 3 masculine adults would have higher self esteem than feminine adults and 4 the importance of feminine identity would moderate the relationship between gender identity and self esteem a total of 395 adolescent and adult females completed a survey that addressed these hypotheses results of the analyses reveal that there are differences in self esteem based on age gender identity and importance of feminine identity in addition there is evidence that suggests that importance of feminine identity moderates the relationship between gender identity and selfesteem for the adolescent sample but not for the adult sample implications of the results are discussed
